The Green Revolution Genetically modified organisms (GMOs) took agricultural research by storm in the mid-1990s, contributing to the creation of what we see today as the modern food system. Farmers in low-income countries started to buy and use seed and fertiliser produced by rich countries, often for the first time in their farming history. Risks were largely overlooked because the technology came from rich, developed countries, and its use had never been more than a niche (but growing) part of farming before. It wasn't until a series of poor food systems and environmental crises surfaced that people started to look at the practices. [1] The Green Revolution was a pivotal moment in the history of agriculture, the subject of two volumes of the critically acclaimed, award-winning book The Omnivore's Dilemma by Michael Pollan.

Genetically modifying crops to produce more of a desired ingredient, such as the fatty acids Omega-3 from canola oil, or drought-resistant maize, created market potential for farmers who had never earned more than the proverbial basket of soil. Farmers in the developing world have seen their farmland values increase and they've gained new and lucrative markets for their produce. Yet, farmers are currently still excluded from such sales. Allopolyploids, or hybrid seeds, are banned from being sold in some countries or by some companies for safety reasons (see below). According to IRRI, "The overall impact of these technologies on the world's food supply and food security is very positive. These technologies are seen as improving global food security by increasing the production of key crops... [though] they are also subject to risk. Risks include the potential for gene transfer from genetically modified crops to wild relatives that could adversely affect human and animal health, and the possibility that GMOs could escape from cultivation and be disseminated into the environment." [2] IRRI further stated that it "encourages the use of these technologies to achieve sustainability while also highlighting the need for balance so that the risks inherent to the biotech sector do not exceed the benefits." Genetically modified crops, or GMO for short, are plants, called plants because it's extremely likely that they are made of DNA.

Posts Tagged 'leather' This is a Q&A I had a few weeks ago. I decided to post it here as well, as maybe someone else can benefit from it. Thought it was a neat one. Don't worry, I didn't get it wrong. I just didn't have the answer in front of me the first time I looked at it. Also, before you go judging me for asking a stupid question, it's a question I have at work all the time. I think I've figured out the answer, but I need a solution from you, the reader. Q: What is the best way to style leather that has a bit of crackle and imperfections? Hey, thanks for stopping by! My name's Mike and I'm glad you're here. This is a blog about digital art, design, photography, illustration, and other things I get up to. I post new stuff once a week and would love it if you'd take a look. You can find out more here.

Teaching German World Hamas leader calls for new uprising against Israel Hamas's leader Khaled Mashaal is calling on Palestinians to launch a new intifada against Israel. Mashaal is visiting Germany for the first time. Khaled Mashaal, Hamas's political chief, has called on Palestinians to launch a new uprising against Israel. Speaking to reporters in the central German city of Munster, Mashaal urged Palestinians to "consolidate and further develop all our successful experiences from the past intifadas." He arrived in Germany on Tuesday and was expected to meet with representatives of the German-Palestinian Forum, a pro-Palestinian group, as well as with Christian aid organizations to discuss the prospect of a new intifada against Israel, which could start in or around August. Mashaal's visit was the first for the Hamas leader since his 2013 arrest in Dubai and subsequent release by the United Arab Emirates. Mashaal's meeting in Germany was organized by the Federation of Islamic Organizations in Germany (DIB), an umbrella organization representing 60 Islamic organizations in Germany. Hamas is considered a terrorist group by many countries, but the Muslim Brotherhood group has said its policies have changed to be more conciliatory and open to political cooperation.
